C１

英　　語

（令 和 7 年 度）

〔注意事項〕

1. 試験開始の合図まで，この冊子を開いてはいけません。
2. 解答には黒鉛筆または黒シャープペンシルを使用しなさい。
3. 氏名及び受験番号を解答用紙（Ｃ３）に必ず記入しなさい。
4. この冊子には４問題あります。落丁，乱丁，印刷不鮮明の箇所などがあった場合には申し出なさい。
5. 解答は必ず解答用紙の該当箇所（問題番号・記号と一致する番号・記号のところにある指定された範囲）に記入しなさい。
6. 下書きにはこの冊子の余白を使用しなさい。
7. 試験終了後，問題冊子を持ち帰りなさい。

I. Read the passage below and answer the questions that follow.

'I cannot go on a date with you, Felix. End of discussion!' Anika said on the phone. She was in northern California for the summer. University was finished until next September. She was enjoying a long summer break from studying and was working part time at the mall. However, she missed her friend, Felix. He had gone to Nevada to take university courses over the summer.

Anika knew Felix liked her in a romantic way. He had liked her for a long time. But he'd never had the courage to ask her out — until now. And here he was asking her out over the phone and she was saying no!

'Yes, you can go on a date with me,' Felix responded loudly. He was sitting in a local park talking on his phone. An older lady walking past gave him a surprised look as he smiled in embarrassment.

Anika was twisting her long dark hair around her finger. She was lying on her living room sofa trying to think of what to say. 'My parents would (i)freak out if I dated you.'

'Why?' Felix asked. He was in Reno, which was several hours away by car. Felix had met Anika's parents before and he knew they didn't like him. He had a lot of tattoos and earrings. His blond hair was very spiky and his clothes were a little wild. Anika's family was very conservative. They didn't like 'wild'.

Since Felix knew the reason why Anika's parents would freak out, he didn't need her to answer his question. Instead, he asked, 'Do you have to tell your parents?'

'Of course I have to tell my parents. I don't keep secrets from them,' she replied.

'Yeah. But you don't have to tell your parents everything,' he objected.

'Look — you're a nice guy, Felix ...' Anika began, but she didn't get to finish.

'I am a nice guy!' Felix said, interrupting. 'You're right, I really am a great guy. A (ii)terrific guy! Your parents would love me if they knew me better. They would adore me!'

'I'm sure they would learn to like you eventually,' Anika admitted, laughing. 'Maybe not "love" or "adore". But yes, sure, they might think you're boyfriend (iii)material,' she joked.

'Boyfriend material?' Felix laughed. 'That's a good one.' Then he continued in a more serious tone. 'So don't say anything to them.'

'I can't lie to my mum and dad, Felix,' Anika said, sitting up on the sofa. 'I won't do it.'

'What lying? I asked you to just say nothing to them,' Felix argued. He watched a man jog by with his dog. 'Don't tell them about me. That's not lying.'

'(A)Yes, it is,' Anika replied. 'It's a lie by omission.'

'Oh, look at you, using the big words,' Felix joked. '"Omission". It's not like that. If you don't say anything … I mean if you say nothing about me to them …'

'Then I have omitted the facts,' Anika said in a serious voice. Suddenly, Anika's mood changed and she became less serious. 'Anyway, omission is not a big word.'

Felix laughed. 'I failed my English class. So, it's a big word to me,' he joked.

Felix was from Germany, so English was his second language. He'd had a hard time over the last year. That's why he was taking English courses in Reno over the summer.

'If that's too big of a word for you, then we're finished,' Anika said, jokingly. 'I simply can't date someone with a small vocabulary.'

'Ahh, but you would date me otherwise?' Felix said with a smile.

It was Anika's turn to laugh. 'I guess you got me! Yes, I mean … Yes,

I like you. There, I said it. OK?'

'You said you like me!' Felix repeated. He had been sitting on a park bench. Now he stood up as he continued talking and paced around in a circle. 'Great. But that does nothing for me.'

'What do you mean?' Anika had not expected him to say that.

'Think about it,' he said. 'Saying that you like me makes it worse. Now I know you like me, so why can't we date? This is frustrating!'

'Let me finish,' Anika said. She got up from the sofa and started walking around the living room. 'I'm not joking with you, Felix. I promise that I'll go out with you. When you've finished with your classes and come back to California, we can see each other. But I do have to tell my (iv)folks.'

This was great news for Felix. His classes would be over next month, so he'd soon be able to see Anika. However, he still wondered why she had to talk to her parents. He just didn't get it, so he decided to ask. 'I guess I still don't understand why you need to tell your folks. Do you want to get their permission or something?'

'No, I don't need their permission,' she explained. 'It's just the way we are. It's part of our culture, I guess. You know, my family is not from America either. We have different traditions in India.'

'I know that. My family has different traditions, too,' Felix replied.

'Yes, you've said that before. But where I come from, children respect their parents. We include our mothers and fathers in our daily lives.'

'It isn't fair to say that. I respect my parents, too!' Felix interjected.

'You do? Do you include them in your daily life, Felix?' Anika questioned.

'Well,' Felix said, thinking. He didn't really see or talk to his parents very often. And he didn't always ask their advice about things, but he didn't want to tell Anika any of that. Finally, he just replied with, 'Well, I try to call them every week.'

'That's not the same thing, but …' began Anika. She paused. 'Look. It doesn't matter. Don't worry about it,' she said finally. 'So tell me, when will you be done with your summer classes?'

'They're over next month. They don't last that long, you know. I'm only taking these classes to make up for some classes I didn't do so well in.'

'Yes, I heard about that. You failed two classes, right?' Anika said.

There was silence on the other end of the phone.

'Felix, don't worry! I know you're very smart. It's just that things can be hard sometimes when you're away from home. Believe me, you can do it.'

'Thanks,' Felix replied. 'I really do study a lot. In fact, my teachers know that I'm a good student. It's just that grammar can be hard for me and the classes are all in English, so I have trouble sometimes.'

Anika nodded in understanding. She had also had trouble in some classes last year, but then she hired a professional tutor who had helped her a lot. 'When you come back, I'm going to help you study English,' she said. 'I'll show you everything my tutor taught me. I insist.'

'Really? That will help me a lot,' Felix said. 'But I need to do something first.'

'What is that?' Anika asked in surprise.

(B)'Before you can be my tutor,' he said in a serious voice, 'I'll need to ask my parents.' Felix cracked up laughing.

'Very funny,' Anika said, shaking her head. 'Just for that, I'm going to be a very tough tutor!'

[Excerpted from Olly Richards, Short Stories in English for Intermediate Learners: Read for pleasure at your level, expand your vocabulary and learn English the fun way!, Teach Yourself, 2019.]

Questions

1. For underlined parts (i) - (iv), three of the definitions are correct, but one is incorrect. Which one is incorrect? Answer (i), (ii), (iii), or (iv).

   (i) freak out — to suddenly become angry

   (ii) terrific — terrifying

   (iii) material — someone good enough for a particular job or position

   (iv) folks — parents

2. Explain the content of underlined part (A) in accordance with the context of the passage. Answer in Japanese.

3. Read underlined part (B). Will Felix ask his parents if Anika can be his tutor? Answer 'Yes' or 'No', and explain your answer. Answer in Japanese.

II. Read the passage below and answer the questions that follow.

Not too many decades ago people thought the sign communication used by the deaf was just a sort of inchoate[*1] gesticulation[*2] to get vague wants and feelings across. Teachers disapproved of signing; they even punished children for doing it. Lip-reading and written communication were stressed to the complete exclusion of anything involving gesture. (A)It was not until linguists[*3] started getting seriously into the analysis of sign communication systems that it became fully clear just how much they have in common with the spoken ones. Pioneers like Edward Klima and Ursula Bellugi were not just acquainting themselves with a field of linguistic study but creating a new one when they started working on American Sign Language.

It is only the externalization medium that defines a radical break between the two kinds of language: oral production and aural perception for speech, gestural production and visual perception for sign. Linguists today actually speak of 'sign-language phonology[*4]', not because they don't understand that the phono- bit derives from the Greek root meaning 'voice' but because they have discovered that the micro-detail of sign production closely parallels phonology. True sign languages use actions with the fingers, hands, wrists, arms, shoulders, and face in highly complex and minutely articulated movements that take the place of the phonetics[*5] and phonology of spoken languages. Interestingly, fluent users of sign language do not look at the hands of their interlocutor: they look at the face, letting their peripheral vision pick up the information from the hand and arm movements. Embedded in the flow of gestures are subtle influences of each sign on the form of the next. There are structural constraints on the overall shape of a sign, and syntactic structures[*6] within which the signs fit just as pronounced words relate to grammar in a spoken language.

The signs are not some kind of spelled-out substitute for speech. Nor are most signs iconic representations of the way things look. Some signs have an iconic aspect (a hand movement toward the mouth to suggest eating, perhaps, or a movement toward the ground to suggest a concept like 'down' or 'below'); but (B)some signs are apparently random, with hand shapes and arm movements telling you nothing about the actual meaning of the sign, just as the sound of a word normally tells you nothing about its meaning (e.g. big is a very little word, while microscopic is quite a large one). But the crucial point is that sign languages have their own grammar: subjects, objects, verbs, adverbs, conditions on how they are put together, and so on.

All spoken and sign languages exhibit the same human capacity for linguistic expression. Understanding in full detail how sign languages are used in subtle ways is not just a pursuit to be pursued for its own sake by academics; (C)it opens up new vistas of understanding concerning social structure and human diversity.

[Adapted from Geoffrey K. Pullum, Linguistics: Why It Matters, Polity Press, 2018.]

*1 inchoate: not yet properly developed

*2 gesticulation: making movements with hands when describing something

*3 linguist: person who studies languages

*4 phonology: study of how speech sounds are organized

*5 phonetics: study of the physical properties of speech sounds

*6 syntactic structure: arrangement of words to create sentences

Questions

1. Explain the content of underlined part (A) in accordance with the context of the passage. Answer in Japanese.

2. Explain the content of underlined part (B) in accordance with the context of the passage. Answer in Japanese.

3. What does 'it' in underlined part (C) refer to? Choose the most suitable answer among the following options. Answer a, b, c, or d.
   a. sign language
   b. linguistic expression
   c. human capacity
   d. understanding in full detail how sign languages are used in subtle ways

III. Hisae is a Japanese employee in a company in San Francisco, USA. She is talking to her American boss, Susan. Read their conversation and fill in the blanks 1 to 6 with the most appropriate words from the list below.

Hisae: Good morning, Susan. May I have a word with you?

Susan: Sure. What's on your mind?

Hisae: I have made a difficult decision. I have decided to resign and return to Japan.

Susan: I'm sorry to hear that. May I ask why?

Hisae: Well, to be honest, it's because my husband is having a hard time adjusting to life in America. We have been trying to make it work, but it is becoming increasingly clear that the longer we stay here, the more unhappy he will become.

Susan: I never realized Hitoshi was not (1). He seemed fairly content at the picnic last week.

Hisae: He hides it well when we are out in (2). One key thing is, he is not able to work in his field in the US due to visa restrictions. It's a big source of stress and anxiety for him.

Susan: You know, there are a couple of part-time positions we are looking to fill. Do you think Hitoshi might be interested?

Hisae: That's really kind of you Susan, but Hitoshi had some work a couple of months ago with a landscape gardening company, and the language barrier was a bit of an issue. His English proficiency is rather (3), and he felt bad that his co-workers were accommodating his lack of fluency. He quit, and now he gets upset because he feels he isn't contributing to the household economy. It has been difficult for us to adjust to the high cost of living in the US. Housing, healthcare, and education can be much more expensive in San Francisco than in Fukuoka, and we feel like we are struggling to make (4) meet.

Susan: I see. Thank you for letting me know. Is there anything I can do to help out with your return home?

Hisae: Thank you very much. I appreciate your understanding. I don't need any specific support at this time, but I will contact you if something comes up. I am grateful for the opportunity you have given me here and the (5) and friendship you have extended while I was in California.

Susan: You're a very talented individual, I have every confidence you'll do well wherever you end up. Can I ask if you have something lined up in Japan yet?

Hisae: No, not yet. Hitoshi's mom and dad have a spare house next to theirs, so we are going to spend some time with my in-laws in Fukuoka and discuss our next move.

Susan: (6), we are sorry to lose you, but I understand and respect your decision. It was great having you on the team. Please don't hesitate to contact me if you need anything in the future. I wish you all the best as you return to Japan and start a new life.

1.	handling	working	pending	saving	coping
2.	parks	picnics	open	public	places
3.	so-so	limited	decent	high	noticeable
4.	balance	finances	ends	money	income
5.	following	guidance	merits	profits	service
6.	Apparently	Obviously	Especially	However	Perhaps

IV. You received this email from your friend in Melbourne. Write an email in reply (75 – 100 words, not including "Hi Sophie, Thank you for your email."). DO NOT write your name in your answer. Answer in English.

Hi _____,

I think I told you that I love shopping for clothes. Yesterday, I bought ten different items at the second-hand store, but when I got home, I noticed that only nine items were listed on the receipt. They forgot to charge me for a jacket.

What do you think I should do?

Sophie

Hi Sophie,

Thank you for your email.